Dear Mr. Hazlitt:

I happened to read a copy of your "Economics in One Lesson" and was so moved in deep appreciation and admiration of what was said therein, that I took occasion to send a copy to a young man who recently finished Duke University, majoring in economics. He has written the enclosed letter, which I thought you might like to see.

The last sentence in the first paragraph I believe is indicative of the confused state of mind possessed by so many people who are coming out of the universities in the country, and it is a great pity that unfortunately the real lessons in economics cannot be learned in textbooks.

Sincerely yours,
