Mr. Henry Hazlitt
Newsweek
New York, New York

Dear Mr. Hazlitt:

I want you to know you have friends out in the corn country who are glad to find you recovered from your recent illness and back again with Newsweek. Your column was missed and we are very happy to have you back again.

In the absence of your weekly page, I have just finished re-reading again your little volumn lesson in economics published through the Economic Foundation. Your book tells much in a simple way, which is the test of good writing. I wish your Economics was a best seller.

If more people could get the fundamentals in their heads (and they can) political fakery would wane and big government would recede.

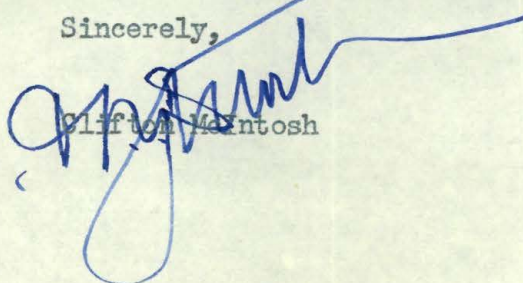

I find it a hard job to discuss economics even with members of my own family, some of whom are in college. But I'm trying.

My hopes went up when our youngest boy (age 12) asked about money. Not for a dollar, but, "Dad, how does this money get out among the people. Where does it come from, I don't understand?"

If we can supply the right answers (and we can) to the young perhaps the market economy, and with it freedom, can be preserved in America.

You are doing a grand job. May your years be many!

Sincerely,

Clifton McIntosh
