Dear Manuel:

Not many weeks ago, we had a phone call here at FEE from a participant at a recent FEE seminar who was planning to visit Guatemala this summer. Before I recognized who he was, I gave him your name. He is Nicholas Sterling, a very smooth talker who professes to be an ardent libertarian -- and perhaps he is. He does a great deal of traveling; apparently he owns a travel agency.

Nick is obviously quite bright. He corresponded under another name over many years with Ed Opitz, especially about books to read for he then had plenty of "time" at his disposal, through the courtesy of the U.S. judicial system. We have no idea what he did before then, or what he does now, to earn his living. Nor do we know why he is going to Guatemala except that he says he will be studying archeology.

You are certainly well able to take care of yourself, but I thought we should give you some warning in case he contacts you on our recommendation.

Best wishes from all of us here.

Sincerely yours,

(Mrs.) Bettina Bien Greaves
